Preventing and Ending Homelessness in the United States

Kiley Gosselin

Management and Program Analyst

Kiley Gosselin serves as Management and Program Analyst at USICH. As part of the Washington, DC, based policy team, Kiley helps coordinate Federal policy efforts to prevent and end homelessness among families and unaccompanied youth and implement programs and policies to connect people experiencing or at-risk of homelessness to a variety of mainstream Federal housing programs.

Prior to joining USICH, Kiley practices law for six years with Holland & Knight LLP focusing in the area of business tax, specifically equity financing for affordable housing projects eligible for low-income housing tax credits under the Federal tax code and various state programs. In addition to tax credit transactions, she counseled state housing credit agencies on compliance issues related to the low income housing tax credit and other Federal housing financing programs, including the use of stimulus funds under the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act.

Prior to entering private practice, Ms. Gosselin worked as a policy analyst and legislative advocate for multiple organizations on state and Federal policy issues relating to affordable and supportive housing, including the National Alliance to End Homelessness and the Connecticut Partnership for Strong Communities. She has also worked in the political arena on various facets of state and national campaigns.

In the community, Ms. Gosselin is involved with local and regional political causes, as well as supporting homelessness and housing advocacy groups. She is on the board of directors of the Massachusetts Housing and Shelter Alliance.

Kiley holds a B.A. in Policy Science and Policy Studies from Rice University in Houston, TX and a J.D. from the University of Connecticut School of Law.
